

SRHMR Submission 21 — John Wentworth

Although the findings of mouse studies rarely translate to humans, the relative ease of mouse compared to human research means most successful scientists prefer mouse-based experiments. Human researchers, particularly clinician-scientists, need better support to perform translational studies. Specific funding for projects that include both basic scientists and junior hospital doctors might increase clinical translation and perhaps encourage more clinicians to engage with research.